Subject: Cost Containment Reserve

Hello,

It is my belief that the cap and trade program is one of the best tools the USA can use to fight climate change, and there should be as few cracks in that tool as possible. That is why the Cost Containment Reserve ought to trigger at a higher price. Given the increase in inflation and the higher market prices, it's vital that the trigger price go up as well. This will not only prevent a large quantity of co2 from being emitted, but also generate more funding for the transition to renewable energy. And remember, the more aggressively we transition to renewables, the less we will rely on those fossil fuels anyhow.

Thank you,
